WE REAP WHAT THEY SOW
Many great inventive minds, fascinated by their journeys into new sciences deeply regretted their well-funded work when the weapons were actually used.

More bullets are produced every year than there are children on the planet to kill. In some places a kalashnikov will cost you less than a fizzy drink. 1,500 nuclear bombs do not make the world safer. Devising high-tech ways to kill from great distance does not somehow excuse the collateral deaths of hundreds of innocent adults and children.

Too many weapons, increasing destructive power, the inevitability of weapons ending up in the wrong hands, and lack of investment in non-violent conflict resolution make the world less safe, not more.

Myth

Fact: If we don’t sell arms someone else will. If we don’t develop them someone else will.

This is a question of morals not business. The claim above used by arms trade and its supporters is the same argument used by drug dealers to sell heroin to children.
